Employers must examine how to design and communicate a benefits program that is both valued by employees and cost effective. A thorough assessment of benefits from the employee's point of view is a sensible step in this process.

CONSIDER THESE FACTS:

- » Benefits programs are often misunderstood and underappreciated, resulting in wasted resources and poor morale

Assessment Fine Tunes Benefits Design and Communications – Helping Both the Employer and Employees

Employers often struggle to gauge the employee's point of view regarding benefit programs. As a result many employers fall into a trap of designing and communicating benefits based on limited information and perspective. This leads to common design and implementation shortcomings such as:

- » Employers frequently fail to recognize the difficulty employees have understanding complex benefit choices and information, particularly in web centric enrollment processes
- » Employees under appreciate the employer's investment in their benefits compensation
- » Lost opportunities to involve employees in cost containment and wellness activity
- » Employees' desires for more diverse and robust voluntary benefit programs are overlooked

Employers can obtain valuable input from employees by using the assessment services provided by Worksite Communications.
